Description

The relationship between hospitals and their medical staffs has changed throughout the years from independence to interdependence. The current economic environment and healthcare reform has caused a reassessment of physician-hospital integration models. Healthcare reform promotes and expectation that better coordination of care will improve patient outcomes and community health status.

With the movement away from a fee-for-service payment and toward provider integration there is the belief that better coordination of care will slow healthcare costs by reducing duplication of services, hospital readmissions, and inappropriate use of the emergency department. Strategies to integrate physician and hospital interests are necessary components to providing quality of care and the achieving economic goals for both parties.

The degree of integration varies from minimal to full integration or full employment. This program explores physician-hospital integration models and has panelists address their successes and challenges in the process.
